PANAMA (AP) A new political movement called Fourth Line has emerged in Panama in the wake of the Oct. 11 coup that toppled President Arnulfo Arias.

It has its roots in the suburb of San Miguelito, a low cost housing development that voted heavily for Arias in the recent elections. But organizers claim Fourth Line does not support Arias nor either of the two presidential candidates proposed by the provisional ruling junta.

Fourth Line, which claims a membership of 12,000, is pressing for national elections with new candidates within a year. It has submitted a statement of objectives to provisional President Jose M. Pinilla with a Monday deadline for his answer.

If Pinilla does not meet the deadline, Fourth Line has promised a campaign of "massive, nonviolent opposition."

"We will put on the streets many men, women and children, and perhaps we will be killed," said the statement. "But the more of us that die, the more men, women and children will appear on the streets to shout their inconformity and discontent over the curtailment of our freedom."

Fourth Line leaders say they have persuaded many staunch Arias supporters in San Miguelito to drop their allegiance to the deposed president and work for new elections.

San Miguelito is unique in Panama for its Catholic education program, now five years old, run by a team of priests and nuns from the Archdiocese of Chicago.

Fourth Line's demands include:

—Restoration of individual freedoms within a week.

—The provisional military junta led by Pinilla must be replaced by a civilian junta, which must undertake preparations for national elections not less than six months nor later than one year from now.
